Recruiting Temporary Forest Service Employees Through State Employment Offices—Pilot Study

The USDA Forest Service, in cooperation with State employment offices, is testing a program to utilize State employment offices for recruitment, screening, and referral of applicants for field-going and temporary aid and technician positions. This program, described in this leaflet, is being used as an alternative to the Summer/Seasonal Temporary Employment Program (S/STEP) used by most national forests for filling similar positions. National forests participating in this program will fill their temporary positions from among applicants referred by a local State employment office rather than receiving applications through the S/STEP. The reverse side of this leaflet lists participating national forests and their headquarters.

How To Apply for a Job

Individuals interested in applying for field-going and temporary aid or technician positions at a national forest participating in this program should contact their local State employment office to obtain information about positions and how to apply for them.

Individuals wanting to apply for a position at a national forest outside the area in which they live should consult the Interstate Job Bank at their local State employment office. The Interstate Job Bank is a national system used by State employment offices to publicize job vacancies beyond the local area.

There are no application deadlines for positions covered by this program. It is anticipated that a majority of positions will be filled during the months of March, April, May, and June.

All applicants must be citizens of the United States and be at least 18 years of age at the time they are available for work.

Applicants may apply to only one national forest.
